The Story:

I booked Ivy for a dinner date that was supposed to last 3 hours total. She arrived on time, was lovely from start and we had a fun and erotic meal in a restaurant nearby my hotel. Only downside was that her English isn't there much yet, but then she says she only arrived in the UK in May.

After relocating to the hotel, we got to action. When undressing, it turned out the beautiful pics on the agency web site are apparently fake or have been edited heavily in terms of breast size (there was literally nothing there). It was nice nevertheless, Ivy is not a great kisser but her oral and hand techniques were great and I had to be careful to not fire off during that. She then wanted to massage, which I endured for a few mins however I got the impression that this was an technique to bide time. I turned round again and we had a good fk, a bit of a-level then she came on top of me. Great moaning by her. So far so nice.

At this point we had spend exactly 2 hours including the dinner. She went to the bathroom, took a shower ... and, as it turned out, called a car to pick her up. When she told me a few minutes later I was very disappointed since the agreed and paid for time for this date had been 3 hours. Despite her gentle character and trying to please I found this unexpected turn utterly off-putting.

I told her and she noticed and tried to calm saying she would not have to leave at once when the car arrives. However, the entire atmosphere was gone and of course she did leave precisely when the driver arrived - only 2 hours 30 into the date. Also, the time between her shower and pick-up she spent getting dressed, making herself up etc hence the true date lasted 2 hours instead of the 3.

After she had gone I called the agency to provide my honest feedback - not on the girl who was genuinely nice, but on this practice of leaving early. I had a feeling that that may have been an agency tac since Ivy admitted that since I was her first ever dinner date the agency would have given her clear instructions on how to conduct this date.

However, the lady on the agency phone did not seem to care much, challenged the time of Ivy's departure despite the fact that when we spoke on the phone Ivy was already long gone while she should still have been with me.

Long report short: I will not contact this agency again and recommend you be very careful both regarding your time and money invested in this agency and also the descriptions/photographs of the ladies they advertise.
