The Story:

The 'Huizi' who answered the door was not the same 'Huizi' as in the website photos, or the same 'Huizi' who answered the phone. So the old bait-and-switch had been pulled - not a good start. But actually the flat near Marylebone Station was lovely, and 'Huizi' was very nice too, despite speaking almost no English and being somewhat to the north of 30. I had a great experience, in a distinctly Japanese style, complete with Japanese-style moans and whimpers, and Japanese music in the background. She smelled good too, and the service - starting with a shower - was highly professional, except right at the end. I had paid in full up front, but as I was getting ready to leave she said 'Please give me ?20?'. It was the longest English sentence I had heard during the hour. I had no idea why she wanted ?20 more, because I had not asked for, or received, any 'extras?'. But I paid up. Arguing would have been pointless, given her English, and I didn't want a scene. She had done a good job, and deserved a tip. But I wasn't happy about the bait-and-switch, or the ?20 surcharge, or the non-existent English. It suggested a lack of integrity in the 'Huizi' operation.
