The Premises:

Semi detached house in a reasonable area. House was untidy and neglected inside. Bathroom door wouldn't close and toilet seat was broken. The bed in the room I was shown into was covered in dog hair.

The Lady:

Slim, with a fairly attractive face. However, never got to see her naked....

The Story:

Got scammed by this "lady". I found her on the other site and was attracted by the various fetish services she claimed to offer. I had to take a flight from Heathrow later that morning, and so I called her the day before and booked a 1 hour session. She seemed pleasant and genuine on the phone, and texted me on the morning to confirm I was on my way.

She also texted me a postcode and then gave me the house number when I arrived in the area. I went to the door and she met me wearing jeans and a jumper, and lead me into a messy house - she apologised and said she was decorating.

We went upstairs to a bedroom that was obviously normally used by the dog. I stripped naked and she undressed to bra and knickers, and she started to give me a massage. She then asked me to turn over and started to give me a BBBJ, however at this point various noises could be heard from downstairs.

She said she hoped the noises were the dog, but just needed to go and check that one of her kids hadn't come home early, and she left the room closing the door behind her.

She disappeared for about 15 minutes, during which time I could faintly hear voices from downstairs over the radio that was playing in the room. Then I got a txt message saying her son had come back because he had forgotten his sports kit, and could I creep out of the house and walk round the block, and she would have him out of the house in 5 minutes, and she would give me some money back.

I wasn't particularly happy but did as she asked, trying to quietly get down the very creaky stairs, and left the house. It obviously occurred to me at this stage that this could be a scam, but she had seemed so genuine thus far that I gave her the benefit of the doubt.

Anyway, after walking around the local area for 5 minutes I texted her and asked what was happening, and she replied that her son was waiting for his Dad to pick him up. Alarm bells were ringing at this stage as the son had managed to get home for his "forgotten" sports kit without the Dad providing transport, however I gave it another 15 minutes.

At that point I texted again and got no response, and tried phoning but there was no answer.

I gave up and went to the airport, but just to see what would happen I tried ringing again over an hour later from the airport but still she didn't answer. I thought there was still a slim possibility that she was telling the truth, and so wanted to give her the chance to at least offer another appointment or my money back, but no joy.

So, I was scammed out of ?140. With hindsight, it was probably mistake to let her know I had a flight to catch, so she knew she just had to get me out of the house and play a waiting game.....
