The Story:

After the pricing system was explained, which in itself was a somewhat complicated affair, I opted for a ?60 half-hour massage followed by hand relief. I really needed a strong massage after having been to the gym the previous day and said so, but what I got was a fairly weak back, leg and shoulder caress. Worse, conversation was extremely stilted. E.g. Me: "Do you get many customers here?" Stacey: "Sometimes we do, sometimes we don't", followed by an awkward silence. Charismatic she is not.

The hand relief that followed was so-so: no more, no less.

After that I sensed that I still had a little bit of time left and so asked to continue with the massage. Stacey grudgingly accepted. Conversation was just as sparse as before; she didn't even make the effort to sound as though she was interested in my day. This second massage was over within a couple of minutes. Needless to say, the 30 minutes I paid for meant 30 minutes in the establishment, not half an hour with the WG. All in all, does that sound like it was worth 60 quid?
